

Verses in the Dark

A Collection of Poems

Midnight Rain

The rain taps softly on the glass,

A lullaby for things that pass.

The city sleeps beneath the grey,

And washes all its sins away.

I watch the drops race down the pane,

Each one a thought I can't explain.

The night is long, the streets are bare,

And silence fills the heavy air.

So let it rain, let rivers run,

Till morning wakes and finds the sun.

And I will stand here, watching still,

The midnight rain upon the sill.

The Wanderer

I have walked a thousand roads,

Carried joy and heavy loads.

Seen the mountains touch the sky,

Watched the golden eagles fly.

Every town a different face,

Every field a resting place.

Every fire a story told,

Every night a tale of old.

I have loved and I have lost,

Crossed the sea at any cost.

Still I walk with open eyes,

Underneath the changing skies.

For the road is never done,

There is always more to run.

And the wanderer finds his peace

Where the restless rivers cease.

Forgotten Garden

There is a garden no one tends,
Where ivy climbs and stone path bends.

The roses grow in tangled grace,
A wild and unkempt, lovely place.

The fountain sleeps beneath the moss,

The sundial counts no hours lost.

The lavender has claimed the wall,

And petals drift in autumn's fall.

Here time has softened every edge,

The honeysuckle guards the hedge.

And in the hush of afternoon,

The garden hums its quiet tune.

Come find me in this forgotten green,

Where nothing harsh has ever been.

Among the weeds and blooms we'll stay,

And let the outside world away.

Digital Dreams

We scroll through lives we'll never know,

Through curated, filtered glow.

A thousand faces, none our own,

A thousand voices, all alone.

We type our hearts in glowing screens,

And speak in memes and GIFs and scenes.

We swipe for love, we tap for hope,

We build our worlds with fiber rope.

Yet underneath the data stream,

There lives a very human dream.

To touch, to hold, to breathe the air,

To know that someone's really there.

So close the app, put down the phone,

No feed can cure the ache of home.

The realest thing is skin and bone,

And being known, and not alone.

Of Stars and Small Things

The universe is vast and cold,

A story billions of years old.

And yet a sparrow finds its song,

And knows exactly where to belong.

A child laughs in afternoon light,

A candle holds against the night.

A stranger holds the door ajar,

These things as bright as any star.

Do not be crushed by endless space,

You are a singular, breathing grace.

The cosmos burned for years untold,

To make the hand that you now hold.

So marvel at the small and near,

The cup of tea, the voice you hear.

The grand design, if there is one,

Lives in the rising of each sun.